Why I Keep Shoveling the Cursed Driveway

by Jeff Gundy in the January 2023 issue

Cars waver down the glassy streets, somebody in a pickup scrapes the parking lot. Nobody trusts anybody to stop for the signs. Every cough, mine or yours, might tip us off the edge of the world. Still, geese rattle over in their honky skeins, and the mallards paddle sweetly on the quarry, clump down the frozen creek. The famous white duck with the bad wing is fatter than ever. I shoveled my long driveway twice, grumpy, leaving scraps of snow like words snapped free from a broken sonnet. This will all melt, I kept thinking, even as I kept pushing snow.
