Two Boulders

by Paul Willis in the March 2023 issue

On Panther Creek in the Sierra, I saw a boulder splashed with pale green crustose lichen, merged and matted all across its granite sides, just the way a sandstone boulder used to be in a small ravine beside our home.

Then a wildfire poured itself down that ravine, and the eucalyptus dripped with flame, scorching all that lovely lichen.

That was eight years ago, and the sandstone boulder shoulders only a ghostly palette, little outlines of charcoal shadows.

Some wounds are like that, some insults never heal.
