It's June when she's burned at the stake, lavender blooming in French fields, lilacs beginning to fade, their honeyed scent mingling with smoke as onlookers weep to watch flames licking her naked flesh, but she doesn't flinch, she will not recant even though this is the price she pays for believing the Divine Spark, gifted from birth, resides within each of us, nor does she know that seven hundred years will pass before she comes to light as the woman who writes that her Soul so burned in Love's fiery furnace, she feels no fire, for she is fire, the fire of Love.
