

Leaving

by Luci Shaw in the October 2023 issue

How dutifully Fall's coppery leaves layer themselves, the earlier fallen having spread a first carpet over the dry rug of gravel and October grass. Steep hillsides are flush with ruddy foliage, the old leaves on the vine maples preach how senescence may be a lovely thing.

Yet I cry about the losses, the inevitable decay, and pray, with small remaining fragments of memory, for my interior loves (like buffing my old wooden writing desk with soft cloth until it gleams, smelling of oil).

May what is yet to be borne in memory be, at least for now, sustained. Here, in this moment, I yearn to learn the discipline of seeing something treasured, watching it pass, then letting it go.
Letting it go.
