Blood Memory

by Charles Hughes in the January 2024 issue

A field where nothing grows appeared to me— A onetime dream, so far, not long ago— Much as you see in pictures: no man's land. Nowhere I've been in waking life, although I seem to know this place; I'm running here, The path I'm running on bordering trenches And craters, interweaving scorched remains Of trees, from time to time bypassing rubble, Once lived-in rubble, house, barn, church, its cross On top but sideways like a fallen arrow. Unhurt, unhurried, I'm (I sense this) meant To be here, running at this jogging pace In the direction pointed by the cross. The evil thing still happening here must be The why of it, this running here, alone.

Thunder far off? Explosions. Intermittent, Persistent clatter—of?—machine-gun fire. Louder and louder as I run. White flashes Nibbling away the dead gray sky ahead; Their fleeting shapes recalling cut white flowers Left on a grave to fade to next to nothing. The darkness has not overcome the light, I'm saying, praying—running faster—when, As if God's providence has run amok, Bursting white flashes, now bright rain, consume The sky, then the booming shaking wakes me up Before the peace, before I've heard my name.
