A leather-bound Bible hangs on the gallery wall, a strap running beneath its spine. Its cover is opened just enough so that torrents of thinly cut strips of scripture cascade from its gilt-edge pages. Has the artist vandalized the word? Or is she showing the word erupting from its rectilinear confines to act upon us?

Linda Ekstrom has been altering and reconfiguring Bibles since the 1990s. By cutting, braiding, pearling, chain-linking, and forming spheres from Bible pages, she summons viewers to ponder the sacred text via physical and tactile means, considering its presence anew.

In the rubrics of contemporary art, Ekstrom is a conceptual artist. But unlike the imageless, arid, and arcane textual presentations often associated with that term, her work embraces women’s handicraft and aesthetics: textiles, clothing, stitchery, embroidery, and fine art papers. Ekstrom draws spiritual sustenance from her participation in parish worship led by the Roman Catholic Women Priests movement. A lifelong Catholic, her early artistic commissions included the creation of modernist illustrations for the lectionary and psalter used in mass.

Ekstrom’s fascination with transforming sacred texts into new art forms has consistently produced innovative works. In Mary (2010), she gathered all the biblical words attributed to Jesus’ mother to produce an intertwining arabesque made of all of the letters in those words. She has also inventively engaged Christian mystics Simone Weil, Teresa of Ávila, and Rita of Cascia. As art critic Leah Ollman has observed, Ekstrom is a master of unmaking and remaking, undoing what has been done, unsettling what is presumed to be settled, and creating new wholes out of her deliberative rupture of existing concepts and materials.
