In Florence

On the Piazza della Signoria, under the gaze of Michelangelo's David (a decent copy rather), among the crowds, a horse-drawn carriage or two, afternoon sun assaulting the air, an English bulldog made his deliberate way from the Uffizi, heedless of the horses, carts, and people, all of whom stopped to let him pass, as clearly he knew they would. That dog is tight! exclaimed a teenage American to his two friends. Insouciant, regal, fat, the dog strolled to a gelato shop he entered to lie down, his legs splayed out, on the cool floor. He's very English, declared the proprietor, who knew his name, which I've forgotten. Sitting beside my new acquaintance where he snorted at ease, I stroked his back and struck up conversation until a server bent politely over to say I wasn't allowed to sit on the floor. Bidding the English gentleman goodbye, I took my leave, back to the plaza where, centuries ago, Savonarola conducted his bonfire of the vanities, and where, a few years later, church officials oversaw his hanging for heresy, his body burned, where Michelangelo's David (a copy rather) now looks over the scene I walked across convinced that if we had a thousand people in the world with the bearing and tranquility of that dog, our troubles here would very soon resolve.
