

How It Begins

While I thought that I was learning how to live, I have been learning how to die.

— Leonardo da Vinci

It will come to you wrapped in the soft cerements of the after-dark rains, will enter your awareness like the whisper of a long-ago companion.

 You will want to stay.

No one will insist you welcome it.
At first, you will speak more often in the future tense, but soon you will tire of words and wish for a silence in which to make ready.

You may trust in this: that all will be accomplished with immense care.

 Your body, old companion, will still be there to lead you, having always known the way.
